Competitors in the 2016 Resolute Cup must be amateur sailors and be members of the club that they represent. The competition is held in supplied Melges 20 and Sonar keelboats, with standardized sails and rigging, ensuring a true one-design competition where the skill of the sailors—their tactics, boat speed and teamwork—determines the

City of Glen Cove to Host Sunset 9/11 Remembrance Ceremony September 11, 2016 at 6:30 p.m. at Pratt Park

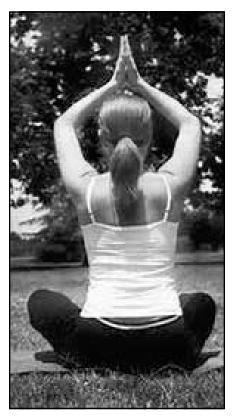

Recognizing the 15th anniversary of a day that forever changed our lives; Mayor Reggie Spinello will host a special sunset ceremony on Sunday, September 11th at 6:30 p.m. at Glen Cove's 9/11 Memorial in Pratt Park, 10 Glen Cove Avenue. Joining the Mayor will be representatives of the Glen Cove City Council, Glen Cove Police Department, Volunteer Fire Department, Auxiliary Police, Glen Cove EMS, Harbor Patrol, and Glen Cove Chamber of Commerce along with distinguished guests, musicians, and local veterans.

"This year will mark the 15th anniversary of the 9/11 attacks and although much time has passed, the memories of those lost and the pain suffered on that day remains fresh on the minds of many in our community, said Mayor Spinello. "We will never forget the 2,997 people whose lives were lost on that tragic day and with each passing year we continue to honor and remember the four Glen Cove residents - Edward J. Lehman, Matthew T. McDermott, John F. Puckett and Joseph J. Zuccala - whose lives were stolen from their family and friends."

"Glen Cove residents are invited to join the remembrance ceremony as the program will pay tribute to the fallen, recognize the heroic acts of first responders and everyday people, and remind us how the Glen Cove community came together to support its own," added Mayor Spinello. At the close of the ceremony, candles will be lit to honor those innocent lives that were lost as a result of one of the darkest days in American history.

Mill Neck Services Helps Former Deaf Education Center Student Get Back on his Feet

Wani, a former student of Mill Neck Manor School for the Deaf, has spent most of his life in silence, unable to communicate with the world around him.

Born Deaf, losing both of his parents at a young age coupled with a string of misfortunes, has landed Wani in a nursing home for the past 16 years. The trouble is that Wani, who is only 52 years old—and extremely smart and capable—doesn't belong in a nursing home: he belongs back in the community. Wani deserves to begin a new journey, experience meaningful relationships and let the light back into his life—a light that has been dark for quite some time now.

When Patricia Gormley, Medicaid Services Coordinator, and Christine Oddo, Associate Director of Mill Neck Services—an organization that gives Deaf and hard of hearing people access to employment and community services—found out about this, they made it their first priority to break Wani free. Free of feeling trapped; free of thinking this was all that life had to offer; and free of living as though he was already gone.

Upon first meeting, Wani aimlessly walked the halls of A. Holly Paterson Extended Care Facility in Uniondale. We headed over to a quiet area to chat, when Wani politely pulled up an extra chair for me—he aptly noticed there wasn't enough seats for the three of Wani stared back at us with heavy eyes—eyes that had seen a lot of hurt, eyes that had given up hope. "I'm just tired today," he said to us, his fingers flowing through the air to communicate in American Sign Language.

Christine brought him the good news that she was going to visit the new Epic community home in Port Jefferson Station that he would be moving to soon. "It's really lovely," she said. "I think you'll like it." She went on to explain about the Mill Neck Services program he could join, Day Habilitation—a program for people who are Deaf and have other disabilities, helping them to become more independent through socialization, communication and leisurely activities. Wani's lips curled up into a smile for the first time all day: it suited him.

Wani was adamant that he wanted to be around Deaf people. Who could blame him? No one knew sign language at the nursing home except for Nick, a security guard. But Wani, who grew up in Harlem, N.Y., was unfortunately accustomed to being unable to communicate with the people around him. "My father died when I was nine; he didn't know any sign language," he explained. "My mother signed fluently but she died four years after my father. Then, I went to live with my aunt who knew some sign, but not much."

When Wani was 19 years old, he attended Mill Neck Manor School for the Deaf—a school that helps Deaf children to unlock their potential through quality education. "I really enjoyed it there," he said. But while in school, the tragedies that Wani endured during his childhood caught up with him. He was thrown into an unfathomable depth of depression. Unable to think of a way out, Wani suffered a self-inflicted injury that caused him to have seizures, ultimately landing him in an extended care nursing facility.

"My mother and my father were gone and I was so scared and alone," Wani recalled. "I didn't have Mill Neck's phone number; I kept looking through the phone book." Christine signed "I'm sorry" with her hand circling her heart. "But we're here now."

"I trust you," Wani replied. "I know you'll get me out of here."

Wani's story is leading example of the isolation and helplessness a Deaf person can feel when they aren't given the right tools and resources. But Wani's story is also one of strength and perseverance. His future finally looks bright: Mill Neck Services will make sure it stays that way.

For more information on Mill Neck Services or how to help individuals just like Wani, please call 516-922-3818 or visit www.millneck.org.

Letters to the Editor

Setting It Straight To The Editor,

A recent letter to the local media concerning me had several inaccuracies.

First, regarding my wife's brief employment with the Glen Cove City Attorney's office. Elaine was not "separated" from her position as a Special City Prosecutor handling trucking violations in the Glen Cove City Court, she RESIGNED. To imply otherwise is disingenuous at best.

During the first 12 months of her employment alone, Elaine's successful prosecution of trucking violations earned the City over $130,000. These fines far exceeded those collected for housing violations during the same time period at a mere fraction of the cost of the then and current Deputy City Attorney's part time salary, whose responsibility it is to prosecute housing violations. Elaine's hard work and diligence in her prosecutorial work earned her much praise from both City Court personnel and members of the Glen Cove Police Department.

Second, yes, I was an avid supporter of the Mayor in his 2013 mayoral bid. I believed that based on his statements and campaign promises that we shared the same values and vision for Glen Cove. Unfortunately, it was not until after Reggie was sworn into office and he decided to support the very projects he criticized that he lost not only my support but also my faith in him.

Contrary to his initial campaign promises, the Mayor now advocates continuous increased city spending, increased bonding and increased residential waterfront development. I have been against the overdevelopment of the Glen Cove waterfront long before Reggie ran for office. I was also appalled by his actions to force out Glen Cove Junior Baseball/Softball from its use of the Glen Cove baseball fields after many years of servicing our city youth. I expressed my displeasure to him concerning these matters long before my wife resigned from her post with the City Attorney's office.

To those that want to support the Mayor's current policies, that is their perogative. As for me, I can not and will not support policies that will adversely affect our city's future. To those same people I will also say that although it may be a novel idea it is possible to state one's position without having to throw oneself in the mud and roll around in.

Glen Cove senior enjoys an animated experience

Glen Cove High School senior Julia Farley recently spent a few hours at Blue Sky Studios, learning firsthand about the animated film business.

Blue Sky Studios is best known for producing the "Ice Age" and "Rio" series of animated films, as well as "The Peanuts Movie," "Horton Hears a Who," "Robots" and many others. Julia's animated piece, "Pretty" won many accolades last spring, including several local film festival honors. TV Production teacher Chris Barry sent Julia's piece to his friend Tom Cardone, who began his career with Walt Disney Feature Animation and is now art director at Blue Sky.

"I knew that Julia's piece was so good and on such another level that I had to send it out there and Tom was the most obvious choice," Barry said. "He's been successfully working in animation for 30 years and I wanted someone of his caliber to see Julia's work.

"This is really sophisticated and well done," Cardone said of Julia's work. "I can't believe she's only in high school."

Cardone then invited Julia and Mr. Barry up for a tour of the company's headquarters in Greenwich, Connecticut.

They pair had an amazing visit, touring the facility and learning about the entire creative process of developing a major animated film.

"It was an incredible opportunity for Julia," Barry said. "She wants to be an animator and to actually see that career in action was a really great thing for her."

Cardone encouraged Julia to stay on this path and apply for an internship at Blue Sky once she was in college.

Name the Celebrity

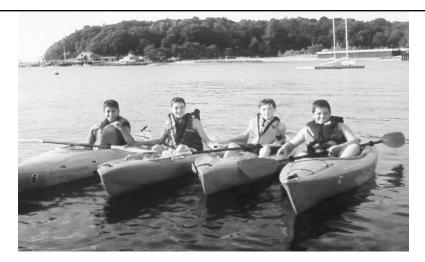

This week's celebrity was born in Hither Green, Lewisham, London, on Dec. 18, 1888. She made her stage debut in 1905, at the age of 13, touring with Seymour Hicks, a very well known British stage and screen actor in both silent and sound films. As well as in his musical "Bluebell in Fairyland", our celebrity appeared in numerous British stage performances in the early 1900s in through the 1930s, including the title character in "Peter Pan" and in W. Somerset Maugham's "The Letter" and "The Sacred Flame". She had done her first silent film in England in 1913, "The Eleventh Commandment", but turned to film full-time in 1940, finding success in Hollywood, in a variety of character roles and was frequently cast as a disapproving aristocratic society woman, although she sometimes played lively, approachable types, as she did in "Rebecca" (1940), as Laurence Olivier's character's sister, "Beatrice Lacy". She was nominated three times for an Academy Award for Best Supporting Actress for her performances as Bette Davis' mother in "Now, Voyager" (1942), a skeptical nun in "The Song of Bernadette" (1943) with Jennifer Jones and Vincent Price, and as Rex Harrison's mother, "Mrs. Higgins", in "My Fair Lady" (1964) with Audrey Hepburn. This columnist's favorite role taken by our celebrity is as "Mrs. Hamilton", the rich, self-centered church congregant, in the 1947 version of "The Bishop's Wife" with Loretta Young and Cary Grant. Her handling of David "The Bishop" Niven's bottom stuck to a chair was priceless! Everybody should have a butler like her's! "Go get something or other!, says she, with a flutter of her fingers.

Last week's celebrity was Eric Blore. He was very busy with movies from 1934 through most of the 1940s. He appeared in five of the nine Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers dance musicals. Some of his best mugging and scripted lines were in "Top Hat" (1935) and "Shall We Dance" (1937) of that series. He was also cast very effectively as valet/butler "Jamison" in the screen adaptations of the Wolfe Kaufman "Lone Wolf" mystery novel series. There were eleven films between 1940 and 1947 with all but the last three starring dashing, sonorous-voiced Warren William, who had a greater profile than "The Great Profile", John Barrymore, as "Michael Lanyard". This was a popular series with first rate scripts and good production values to keep the public coming back for more. Blore was also invited into the company of stock players ruled over by zany comedy director, Preston Sturges. Though Blore only did two films for Sturges, his role in the first of these, "The Lady Eve" (1941), was a Blore tour de force. Playing the suave confidence man, "Pearly", to his bunko acquaintances Barbara Stanwyck and Charles Coburn, he took the role of pseudo-wealthy "Sir Alfred McGlennon Keith", out to fleece the local American business gentry. His scene with a gullible Henry Fonda taking in "Sir Alfred's" concocted story of Stanwyck's being a twin daughter of the lady of the manor by way of her coachman is a delight, punctuated with Blore interrupting perplexed Fonda's questions with a loud "Shhhhhhhh" of silence at each question.

Inevitably, the parts started to become less frequent. Still he enjoyed a variety of roles, including the opportunity of animation immortality when Walt Disney chose him for the voice of "Mr. Toad" in the classic short "The Wind in the Willows" (1949). As sometimes is the case when personalities move to obscurity, their deaths are prematurely announced. Such was the case with Blore when the New Yorker journalist, Kenneth Tynan, reported him as having passed on. Bore's lawyers raised a flurry, as did the editor of the New Yorker, who claimed the periodical had never had to print a retraction. On March 2, 1959, the night before the highly profiled retraction appeared, Blore died. The next morning, the New Yorker was the only publication with the wrong information. It seems likely Blore would have been particularly tickled with the irony of this last comedic bit in honor of his passing.

- Ann DiPietro

Dear Great Book Guru,

With the beginning of the Fall months, I am looking for a mystery series to throw myself into- I love a British village setting- something with lots of local color and character developmentany ideas?

Autumnal Mystery Lover

Dear Autumnal Mystery Lover,

I just arrived back from the annual Barbara Pym Conference in Oxford, England where I was introduced to a great series that meets all your demands: Hazel Holt's SHEILA MALORY NOVELS. Hazel Holt was Pym's literary executor and she died recently so this year's conference was a tribute to Holt. Sheila Malory is a middle-aged writer living in the lovely hamlet of Taviscombe about two hours south of London. Her daily routines and encounters with friends and townspeople form the basis of each of Holt's twenty mysteries. Interestingly, much of the happenings in Taviscombe remind me of life here in Sea Cliff whether it be restaurant encounters, clandestine meetings, or unscrupulous property development. My favorite so far was A TIME TO DIE. Malory fights a noble fight against a large corporation that is trying to rezone a large tract of land potentially changing the entire character of her beautiful village. Soon there are a few suspicious deaths that Malory investigates, leading her to believe some people will let "nothing or no one stand in their way." A fascinating study of the banality of evil- highly recommended!

I'm blessed to have learned some lessons here are certain events in our lives that, from the instant they happen, we forever remember details of the moment, exactly where we were and how we felt. I've recently added another such moment.

On April 8 at 8:21 a.m., the doctor told me I had cancer. After an April 1 biopsy of a lesion, he called me while I was in upstate Saratoga Springs, at a journalism conference.

JOHN O'CONNELL

I felt nauseous, worried, angry, depressed, confused, alone, anxious to take action, and impatient that the next steps would take days to arrange. I tried to summon faith. I searched my brain for a plan, though I knew that while I would be in charge, others, better at this, would make the real plan.

The sore throat I'd had for several weeks had turned out not to be strep, and it wasn't viral, either. It was a squamous cell carcinoma of my soft palate.

That call began a new, blessedly brief, painful, depressing, frightening, and now happily resolved chapter of my life. Shakespeare's words, "All's well that ends well," ring more true for me than ever. On June 24 at 4:20 p.m. — after almost three months of biopsies, a CT scan, a PET scan, blood tests, two surgeries a month apart, two periods of healing, serious side effects from anesthesia, about 30 Percocets, painful swallowing and eating, many doctors' appointments, troubled nights and the prayers of hundreds of loved ones — the surgeon told me the results of the final pathology report: My cancer is gone. I am cancer-free.

Now begins a new chapter: five years of at least quarterly examinations and tests to watch for reoccurrence.

I've been reflecting on what I've been through, how it has felt, and how lucky I am to have had my cancer so quickly found and eliminated.

While others suffer through years of treatments and disfigurement, and millions die of their cancers, mine was detected early and is now gone, all in less than five months from the time I decided I'd get that sore throat checked out. Thank God, my cancer was caught in a very early stage, it comprised a relatively small and superficial area of cancerous cells, it hadn't traveled to or come from elsewhere in my body, and it occurred in an easily accessible location for surgery. I didn't require radiation or chemotherapy.

But even with my middleweight bout with cancer, I earned a glimpse of the suffering that others who fight harder battles must endure. My anxiety was just as real as theirs, but brief. My prognosis was excellent from the start. Theirs often isn't.

So my gladness is quiet, humble in the presence of others' ongoing and much greater challenges.

One thing I've learned is not to ignore pain. Left undiagnosed and untreated, my early, small but potentially metastatic cancer would have grown wider and, worse, deeper. The outcome would have been much less optimistic, and my small suffering much greater. I learned that managing your health, taking action when something isn't right and seeking professional help, must be a top priority in your life.

the suffering that I've learned how others who fight many people care about me. People I didn't think harder battles even knew me, much less cared, people who I with cancer must thought were happy endure. hardly thinking of me, went out of their way to send a text or email (it hurt too much to talk, so no one called), not once but often expressing their concerns, offering their prayers, wishing me well.

So I've learned to think more about others when they're in need. Diseases isolate. You tend to think a lot about yourself. It's hard to shift your attention to others when you're hurting, mentally or physically. But you have to try. It's the best way to take your mind off your worries: focus on others.

I learned from all those people reaching out to me that we need support. It's obvious we need the help of surgeons and other doctors, their physician's assistants, the medical secretaries, pathologists, scanning technicians and record keepers. But I learned that getting through a tough time — cancer or anything else — depends on valuing the kindness people extend to you. Cherish them. Care for them, too, when they need it.

I've also learned not to read the pathology reports yourself before you see the doctor. You may see medical terms that translate to you as doom, but don't really mean that. Let the doctor do the reading and the explaining.

I'm so lucky to have learned these lessons. A coworker asked if I thought I'd been spared to accomplish something grand. I don't know — just like the dear folks who don't know how much their generosity, grace, prayers and concern have meant to me.
